

NFP takes liability specialist Dubrowsky from Willis

John Hewitt Jones 07 November 2019

New York-headquartered broker NFP has appointed Jared Dubrowsky as a vice president at its environmental practice, The Insurance Insider can reveal.

He is based in Miami in the new role and reports to NFP's head of environmental liability Chris Alviggi.

Prior to joining NFP, Dubrowsky was a senior broker at Willis Towers Watson, specialising in the placement of environmental risks.

Before working at WTW he served as a vice president at Marsh and a regional environmental risk officer at Santander, according to LinkedIn.

Dubrowsky's appointment comes as the liability market grapples with a range of major environmental threats, including the impact of perfluoroalkyl and polyfluoroalkyl (PFAS) substances.

Concerns over the long-term effect of such chemicals, which have been designated as "potentially carcinogenic" by the US Environmental Protection Agency last month prompted a shareholder securities class action against DuPont spin-off The Chemours Company.

Commenting on the appointment, Alviggi said: "Jared has tremendous potential and he will well positioned to develop his own niche in the market and play an integral part in expanding the NFP Property & Casualty Environmental Practice Group."

"NFP's ability to execute is second to none and we are clearly on our way to delivering a best in class brokerage firm by identifying key talent and acting swiftly," he said.

Dubrowsky added that his new role presents an exciting opportunity to help develop a new portfolio of environmental business.

Market sources said NFP is targeting a broad range of clients seeking environmental cover, ranging from small firms to companies with revenue of more than $1bn.

Willis declined to comment on Dubrowsky's departure.
